Welcome to another edition of the Bob Cats Newsletter. It's night time in the big city, tall shadows overtaking sunny streets darkening the walls of The Saint James Hotel. The big guy sits outside The Black Swan emptying a pint of probably the best beer in the world, ordering another one for himself and a spritzer for Carla Pereira, professional heartbreaker and fado singer, now entering upper middle age, by his side. Streets are empty, business slow, it's summer in the city, nowhere to go.

FLASHES FROM THE PAST

Meet me in the morning, 56th and Wabasha :||
Honey, we could be in Kansas
By time the snow begins to thaw

They say the darkest hour is right before the dawn :||
But you wouldn't know it by me
Every day's been darkness since you been gone

Little rooster crowin', there must be something on his mind :||
Well, I feel just like that rooster
Honey, ya treat me so unkind

The birds are flyin' low babe, honey I feel so exposed :||
Well now, I ain't got any matches
And the station doors are closed

Well, I struggled through barbed wire, felt the hail fall from above :||
Well, you know I even outran the hound dogs
Honey, you know I've earned your love

Look at the sun sinkin' like a ship :||
Ain't that just like my heart, babe
When you kissed my lips

TRACES OF WESTERN SLOPES

MICHAEL BLOOMFIELD.

GOOD NIGHT

Western winds whipping whitecapped waves upon rocky coast, again and again. Eastern pine trees fending off shadows from the salty sea and all its shady memories of loss and salt. Northern songs all captured by the winds of forgotten vallies in the deep end of the wood where a lonesome girl hides from the stars. Southern belles dancing in the saw dust singing of a prairie long lost to oil derricks and lonesome highways.
